PREFACE

The present volume entitled "INDIA'S EXPERIMENT WITH LOCAL DEMOCRACY" is the outcome of the combination of different articles written by different Scholars in their respective areas of interest. The concept of Local Democracy has been popularized in the field of developmental discourse in the third world countries. At the broadest level local governance is defined as "the formulation and execution of collective action at the local level" (Shah and Shah, 2006:1). Shah and Shah (2006) argue that good local governance is not just about providing a range of local services but also about "preserving the life and liberty of residents, creating space for democratic participation and civic dialogue, supporting market-led and environmentally sustainable local development, and facilitating outcomes that enrich the quality of life of residents" (ibid:2). Local government, on the other hand, refers to the specific institutions created, usually by national or sub-national organs of the state (through constitutions, legislation and the like) with a focus on creating the vehicle for the delivery of a set of services in a specific geographical jurisdiction. This means it is possible to have local government without local democracy, but not possible to have good local governance without both good local government and good local democracy. Increasingly the vehicle of local governments/authorities is being seen as an important local area by national governments and international agencies. The United Nations (UN) Secretary-General's High-Level Panel on the Post-2015 development agenda argues "Local authorities form a vital bridge between national governments, communities and citizens and will have a critical role in a new global partnership.... Local authorities have a critical role in setting priorities, executing plans, monitoring results and engaging with local firms and communities." (United Nations 2013: 10) Overall, then, the term local governance is used to describe a broader framework which, along with local government, encompasses civil society and its engagement - either individually as citizens, or in groupings such as civil society organizations, associations, neighbourhood
